Subject: Changes needed to JACS rules

We need to update the below information that appears on the internet under general rules. This seems to be causing some confusion. Any suggestions on some language changes for the below rule? Also in speaking with a local attorney who handles foreclosures, there has been some confusion in what should be handled by Judge Richards (in person) and what can be handled by Judge Shenko (telephone or in person). We may need to add specific language to both JACS calendars. Maybe something along the line of "all Motions for summary judgment foreclosures, motions for final default judgment and entry of default will be heard by Judge Richards in Person only....."

I need your help with these issues.

Thanks

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE RULES:

If an attorney does not plan to attend a mortgage foreclosure hearing seeking a Final Judgment in person, the attorney must submit a proposed Final Judgment (to be held with the file, not filed) directly to the Clerk of the Court, to be received at least 15 days in advance of the hearing, with copies to be sent concurrently to all parties/counsel of record. A cover letter referencing the case style, case number, and the date and time of the upcoming hearing in addition to a courtesy copy of the original hearing notice for the hearing should accompany the proposed Final Judgment. A proposed Final Judgment should include any requisite calculations (example: ___ days X ___ per diem interest rate = ___ total interest) and list each claimed element of damages separately, all of which must be substantiated by record evidence. Similarly, the Clerk of Court conducts foreclosure sales online, therefore, any such proposed Final Judgment should include language directing the Clerk of Court as follows: "The Clerk of Court shall sell the property at public sale to the highest bidder for cash, except as set forth hereinafter, on _____, 20__ at 11:00 a.m. at www.charlotte.realforeclose.com in accordance with Chapter 45, Florida Statutes." Please do not include a set sales time frame, the Court will designate the sales time frame as applicable.

Re: Writs of Possession in Residential Mortgage Foreclosure cases

Dear Judge Cary:

I would like to share with you a copy of the Administrative Order signed by Chief Judge J. David Walsh of the Seventh Judicial Circuit. Out of concern for violations of the Federal Protecting Tenants in Foreclosure Act, Chief Judge Walsh has ordered that:

“effective April 1, 2010, persons filing for Writs of Possession in residential mortgage foreclosure proceedings in the counties of the Seventh Judicial Circuit must include the following certification in said motions:

I HEREBY CERTIFY that there are no tenants in possession of the subject property, or, if there are, that such tenants have been provided with requisite notice pursuant to the Federal Protecting Tenants at Foreclosure Act, and this motion does not seek an order that violates any tenant’s right to continued occupancy under the Act.”

This administrative order may not protect every tenant in a foreclosed home, but it will puts the mortgagors on notice that the courts have the power and the intention to give tenants the 90 days of protection envisioned by the Federal Protecting Tenants at Foreclosure Act. Keep in mind that the FPTFA only protects bona-fide tenants who have been paying their rents.

As a Legal Aid Service attorney, I have met with many tenants, who are hard-working men and women. Families who are living month to month, working hard to provide the best that they can for their children in a tough economy. These working families have paid their rent religiously and never expected to be evicted.

Perhaps the saddest victims are the single working mothers. A typical single mother who is a tenant in a foreclosed residential property gets home from work in the afternoon and finds a 48-hour Writ of Possession notice posted on her door. At this time of day, she cannot call the courts or a lawyer, as it is past normal business hours. The first 24 hours are already gone by the next morning.

The next morning, this single working Mom takes time off from work, and she calls the Sheriff's office. The deputy tells her that they are only following the court's orders, and that only the judge can stop the eviction. Now she calls or visits the offices of the clerk of the court, and she is told that she has been served with a court order and that only a judge can set it aside. She calls a lawyer and she is told he needs a retainer in order to prepare and file an emergency motion at the last minute.

The day is over, and the last 24 hours are gone. Now this working mother has to spend all night packing her belongings to the best of her ability so that she can go to a homeless shelter with her kids. The foreclosed landlord kept her current month's rent, and her security deposit, and her last month's rent. This single working mother is out several thousand dollars, and her family is homeless, and yet she did nothing wrong. She is only guilty of paying her rent on time to her lawful landlord.

Please review and consider entering an Administrative Order like the one entered in the Seventh Judicial Circuit. Please protect the working citizens of Lee, Collier, Charlotte, Hendry, and Glades counties from having to endure a 48 hour foreclosure eviction in spite of being lawful tenants who pay their rents.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

Albert Balista, Esq.

For release and posting on court website

20th Circuit Judges and Bar Plan Launch of new Civil caseflow management and Delay Reduction Program

In the 20th Circuit, a new civil justice backlog reduction effort is underway. Civil judges, Bar association leaders, court managers and Clerk staff from across the circuit met at Edison State College in January 2010 to look at ways to find creative approaches to address growing volume and delay in civil cases caused by the recent economic downturn. A national consultant, Dr Barry Mahoney from the Justice Management Institute in Denver, was brought in by the Chief Judge Keith Cary, to facilitate the program.

The results of that symposium are having immediate impact. Lawyers, court staff and judges discussed national models and new ideas to reduce delay and assist judges in dealing with the mountainous number of economic related cases filed over the past three years the circuit. Local Civil case management stakeholder groups were formed in Collier, Charlotte and Lee counties that included the Bar leaders and judges. The plans they have formulated are now being implemented circuit wide and those efforts are already showing success.

Since January, Collier and Lee counties began setting older cases for review before Magistrates and Case Managers assigned to help judges battle the backlog. Charlotte county is also planning similar backlog reduction efforts. Case managers and Magistrates are digging through the more than 40,000 civil and foreclosure cases that are clogging the system and setting them for case management conferences or hearings designed to resolve pretrial problems and move them to trial, mediation or swift resolution.

On July 1, 2010 the circuit will launch a full civil differentiated case management and backlog reduction program. The circuit applied to the state for funding to support the backlog program and the state Trial Court Budget Commission not only approved the circuit request, but sought funding for similar Civil and Foreclosure Backlog reduction programs statewide. The Florida legislature approved the program and provided $5.9 million funding for a statewide civil backlog reduction and economic recovery program. The 20th Circuit will receive $425,000 on July 1st to launch the program which will provide Magistrates, Case managers and 300 days of help from senior, retired judges to implement the program.

The goals are ambitious and seek to reduce cases backlogged over 18 months by 50% in one year. Some of the key strategies of the program are:

- Magistrates and Senior judges will be added on July 1st to assist the efforts already underway in Collier and Lee Counties
- Older Backlogged civil cases will be set for conference before Magistrates and senior judges to resolve pretrial delay issues;
- New case management DCM tracks will differentiate between complex, standard, expedited and Foreclosure cases with new screening, time goals and procedures set for each track depending on individual case needs for all cases filed beginning on October 1, 2010;
- Foreclosure cases will be set for expedited default dockets
Before senior judges or referred immediately to managed mediation programs;
- New circuit wide standardized orders, forms and procedures to establish early case management plans will be implemented;
- Judges and case managers will receive improved management reports in cooperation with the Clerks to better track caseload;

The 20th Circuit Civil backlog and delay reduction program is a large undertaking, but court officials are optimistic since the program was developed by and has great support from the Bar leaders and local judges who crafted the new approaches. Additional information on the program can be found on the courts website at www.Ca.cjis20.org.

Florida's High-Speed Answer to a Foreclosure Mess

By GRETCHEN MORGENSON and GERALDINE FABRIKANT

TEN days from now, a four-bedroom house on a cul-de-sac in Middleburg, Fla., is scheduled to be auctioned off at the Clay County courthouse, 25 miles south of Jacksonville.

A judge who recently took over their foreclosure case has ordered Rodney Waters; his fiancée, Terri Reese; and their four children to leave the home they bought in 2006.

Mr. Waters, a supervisor at a local packaging company and the family's sole breadwinner, fell behind on his mortgage two years ago after his property taxes jumped unexpectedly. He now owes $264,000 on the house; a similar home down the street sold for $138,500 in February.

The predicament of the Waters-Reese family is common in Florida today. The state routinely sets new records for foreclosures — in the second quarter, 20.13 percent of its mortgages were delinquent or in foreclosure, a national high, according to the Mortgage Bankers Association. And with housing prices still in a free fall, almost half of all borrowers in Florida owe more on their mortgages than their properties are worth, says CoreLogic, a data firm.

While the Waters-Reese case may not be unusual in Florida, the coming auction of the home is still notable: it will be a result of the Florida Legislature's new effort to cut the number of foreclosures inching their way through the state's courts. Earlier this year, Florida earmarked $9.6 million to set up foreclosures-only courts across the state, staffed by retired judges. The goal of the program, which began in July, is to reduce the foreclosures backlog by 62 percent within a year.

No one disputes that foreclosures dominate Florida's dockets and that something needs to be done to streamline a complex and emotionally wrenching process. But lawyers representing troubled borrowers contend that many of the retired judges called in from the sidelines to oversee these matters are so focused on cutting the caseload that they are unfairly favoring financial institutions at the expense of homeowners.

Lawyers say judges are simply ignoring problematic or contradictory evidence and awarding the right to foreclose to institutions that have yet to prove they own the properties in question.

“Now you show up and you get whatever judge is on the schedule and they have not looked at the file — they don’t even look at the motions,” says April Charney, a lawyer who represents imperiled borrowers at Jacksonville Area Legal Aid. “You get a five-minute hearing. It’s a factory.”

But Victor Tobin, chief judge in the 17th Judicial Circuit, which includes Broward County, defended the effort. “There are more assets devoted to those three foreclosure divisions in Broward than to any other division in the building in terms of case managers and that sort of thing to help the general public,” he said. “The people who come get fully, fully heard.”

In any event, huge numbers of cases are being handled. In an article last week in The Florida Bar News, Belvin Perry Jr., chief judge for the state’s Ninth Judicial Circuit, said that during July, 1,319 cases had been closed by three senior judges in the district’s two counties, Orange and Osceola.

Florida’s foreclosure mess is made murkier by what analysts and lawyers involved in the process say are questionable practices by some law firms that are representing banks. Such tactics, these people say, have drawn out the process significantly, making it extremely lucrative for the lawyers and more draining for troubled homeowners.

Doctored or dubious records presented in court as proof of a bank’s ownership have become such a problem that Bill McCollum, the Florida attorney general, announced last month that his office was investigating the state’s three largest foreclosure law firms representing lenders.

“Thousands of final judgments of foreclosure against Florida homeowners may have been the result of the allegedly improper actions of these law firms,” said Mr. McCollum in an interview. “We’ve had so many complaints that I am confident there is a great deal of fraud here.”

To be sure, adjudicating foreclosure cases is difficult, complicated by multiple transfers of mortgages and notes when a loan is sold, bewildering paperwork submitted by loan servicers and shoddy record-keeping by the many institutions that touched the mortgages during the byzantine securitization process that fueled the housing boom.

Nevertheless, Florida law requires that before a financial institution can foreclose on a borrower, it must prove to the court that it actually has the standing to do so. In other words, it has to show that it is truly the owner. And this is done by demonstrating ownership of the note underlying the mortgage.

The Waters case offers an example of how wrong things can go in complex foreclosure cases.

While AmTrust, a failed Ohio bank that is now a division of New York Community Bank, said it owned the note and could foreclose, Mr. Waters's lawyer produced documents showing that Fannie Mae, the taxpayer-owned mortgage finance giant, was really the owner.

In spite of the conflicting evidence, Aaron Bowden, the retired judge overseeing the case, made a summary judgment on Aug. 3, ruling that the property should go back to AmTrust.

Mr. Bowden did not return phone calls seeking comment.

Chip Parker, managing partner at Parker & DuFresne in Jacksonville, which represents Mr. Waters, said: "The threshold issue in any foreclosure case is who has the right to foreclose. We presented evidence to the judge that Fannie Mae owns the note and mortgage, and yet the judge ignored this crucial evidence."

Mr. Parker is concerned that some homeowners are victimized by the system. "What we are talking about is railroading homeowners through the rocket docket," he added.

When contacted by a reporter on Thursday, a spokeswoman for Fannie Mae confirmed that it owned the note.

David Tong, the lawyer representing AmTrust in the case, declined to comment on the matter. Page 4 But on Friday, he did an about-face, filing papers with the court acknowledging that Fannie Mae owns the note.

Clearing the Backlog

Florida law requires that banks argue their cases before a judge if they want to recover property from borrowers in default, and 471,000 such cases were pending in Florida at the end of July, according to the Florida State Courts administration.

Setting up discrete foreclosure courts statewide was seen as a way to help deal with the issue; consumer law experts say they aren't aware of any other state that has set up a temporary court to work down such a backlog.

But it is paradoxical, say lawyers representing homeowners in the cases, that Florida's attorney general acknowledges problems in the cases while retired judges, intent on reducing caseloads, seem unconcerned about those same problems — like flaws in the banks' documentation of ownership.

“The most shocking thing of all is the A.G.'s office understands the problem and yet the court system turns a blind eye to the fact that mortgage servicers are the problem,” says Margery Golant, a lawyer in South Florida and a former executive at Ocwen, a large mortgage servicing company. “In the meantime, neighborhoods are being destroyed, homeowners' associations are being destroyed, and the tax base is being clobbered.”

Steven P. Combs, a lawyer at Combs, Greene, McLester, who formerly was general counsel to the Fourth Judicial Circuit as well as a family law magistrate, says the entire process may be unconstitutional.

The Florida Supreme Court has consistently recognized the need to hire retired judges on a temporary basis, Mr. Combs said, and has ruled that such a “temporary” use is constitutional.

But because the retired judges are being given foreclosure assignments “repeatedly and consecutively” to the point of usurping the elected judges' jurisdiction over all residential foreclosure cases, he said, their use may not qualify as temporary and could thus violate the Florida constitution.

The fact that these judges are being paid to reduce the court's case load creates a perception among homeowners that the judges have a financial interest in dispensing cases prematurely, Mr. Combs said, creating a potential bias against borrowers and possibly violating their right to due process.

He pointed to a recent case in Broward County in which a retired judge refused to postpone a borrower's foreclosure sale even though the bank had agreed to it. The judge stated that she was there to “dispose of cases.”

“If you are an individual whose house is being foreclosed and you hear these judges are being paid to clean out the backlog, under a realistic appraisal of human tendencies, do you think that the average judge would be biased in favor of prematurely terminating your case to clean out the backlog?” Mr. Combs asked.

J. Thomas McGrady, chief judge in the Sixth Judicial Circuit, said in a press release announcing the program: “We have to clear these cases because of the negative impact they are having on other civil litigation. The real estate crisis has placed a tremendous burden on our judges, and people with other types of pending litigation are also entitled to their day in court.”

Who Owns the Notes?

A foreclosure crisis that has forced millions of delinquent borrowers from their homes across Florida and elsewhere has also created enormous profits for the law firms and foreclosure servicers that represent banks and financial services in these actions.

Among the busiest of these firms are the three under investigation by Florida's attorney general: the Law Offices of Marshall C. Watson; Shapiro & Fishman; and the Law Offices of David J. Stern.

“These law firms appear to be mills,” says Mr. McCollum. “They submit false documents, fabricate the documents, or the documents actually don't exist. They wanted to speed the process up because the faster they get the foreclosures done the better.”

But Mr. Stern said: “I can't speak for the other firms, but I can assure you there has not been submission of fraudulent documents. We feel a lot of it is politically motivated. We have done nothing wrong and are going to cooperate fully.”

Lawyers for the other two firms also disputed the attorney general's contentions, maintaining that they work diligently on behalf of their clients.

Borrowers' lawyers say they confront dubious practices, often involving false documentation “proving” who owns the note on a given property.

Typically, they say, this involves questionable affidavits asserting ownership of a note because the actual document has been lost or cannot be produced. Because the affidavits are often signed by bank representatives who have a stake in the outcome, they should not be allowed as evidence, borrowers' lawyers say.

Yet they routinely are introduced as evidence; the Waters case involves such an affidavit signed by an AmTrust official.

The problem of who owns the note is a result of the process of bundling home loans into securities and selling them to investors — a common practice in the housing boom. This meant that notes documenting ownership on a property were repeatedly transferred, blurring the identity of exactly who controlled the note.

Documents showing that a note has been assigned to a foreclosing bank are often dated after a foreclosure, meaning that the bank bringing the case may not have the right to foreclose.

Other questions arise involving documents with improper notary stamps and wildly different signatures on legal papers supposedly prepared by the same person, borrowers' lawyers say.

In a case in May 2009, Thomas E. Ice, a defense lawyer at Ice Legal in Royal Palm Beach, Fla., took the deposition of Cheryl Samons, an operations manager at the David J. Stern law firm. He asked her about instances at the firm of backdating the assignment of mortgages to allow foreclosures to go forward.

Mr. Ice and his wife, Ariane, who works with him, had found problems with notary stamps on mortgage assignments. "Many assignments of mortgages were signed and notarized with a stamp that had not been issued at the time of the signing, reflecting that the assignment was backdated," Mr. Ice says.

In her court deposition with Mr. Ice, Ms. Samons testified that she was both an executive of the entity that handles the mortgage transfers and an officer at the Stern firm. Mr. Ice says that this creates a conflict of interest because clients of the Stern firm — most of the nation's major banks — benefit from the transfer.

The law firm helps its own clients by "creating an illusion that the signing took place before and it did not," says Mr. Ice.

Mr. Stern attributed any backdating to sloppiness on the part of paralegals and said that it had since been corrected.

As for Ms. Samons's dual roles at the mortgage transfer registry and the law firm, he responded that, "We believe it is a solid practice."

Ms. Samons did not return phone calls seeking comment.

Another popular practice that ties up courts' calendars occurs after a foreclosure is granted and the property is scheduled to be returned to the bank. As ownership shifts from borrower to bank, so do all the obligations associated with it, like payment of homeowners' association dues.

But few banks want to pay these bills, so firms representing them move to delay the final step in the process by canceling the sale of a foreclosed property at the last minute, court officials say. This does not require the banks to restart the foreclosure process, but it keeps the property in the hands of the borrower, who remains responsible for maintenance and association dues.

Earlier this year, Jennifer D. Bailey, administrative judge in Miami-Dade County, said such cancellations were occurring in 55 percent of cases in her district. In July, she instituted new rules to reduce last-minute cancellations, including a requirement that a judge hear the reason.

“There was huge volume to start with and then with this extra bogus stuff going on, the courts were cross-eyed from it,” says Ms. Golant. “There is a certain amount of truth to the gridlock, but the reason for the gridlock is the foreclosure firms are practically running the courtrooms.”

One Firm, Many Cases

The lawyer most closely identified with Florida's foreclosure morass is David J. Stern. He is something of a mystery man within the foreclosure world; it is impossible to reach him by phone since his name is not in the firm's voice-mail directory and, until recently, there were no publicly available photographs of him.

Several prominent borrowers' lawyers who have litigated against his firm say they have never met him.

Operating out of a gleaming eight-story office building in Plantation, Fla., Mr. Stern, 50, has come a long way from the South Texas College of Law, from which he graduated in 1986. He spent his early career as a quality-control lawyer for Gerald Shapiro, a lawyer who represented mortgage lenders. He opened his own firm in 1994; Fannie Mae voted him attorney of the year in 1998.

Mr. Stern's company, which now includes a law firm and ancillary foreclosure support businesses, employs more than 900 people. The firm filed 70,382 foreclosure cases last year.

Critics say the Stern firm has been able to handle this high volume because its lawyers frequently refuse to work with borrowers and are very aggressive about pushing cases through the courts even when there are questions about the documentation.

Mr. Stern sees it differently. “I refer to us as an efficient law firm with a specialization in mortgage lending,” he responded. “Should I feel ashamed that I have built a successful practice?” he asked. “No one references how committed I am, how I built my firm and how I work 20 hours a day.”

But some question the thoroughness of the firm's work. Bill Warner, a private investigator in Sarasota, said the Stern firm filed a foreclosure suit against him on behalf of Deutsche Bank Financial Trust in January 2009. But the bank did not own the property and the suit erred by including in its claims a federal tax lien on another person with the same name but a different Social Security number, Mr. Warner said.

Mr. Warner's mortgage was actually owned by Countrywide, which had sold it to Wells Fargo. "I fought them myself for a year and a half," he recalls. "In the meantime, we did a loan modification with Wells Fargo but Mr. Stern's firm pursued the foreclosure on the property anyway."

Last May, Mr. Warner filed a motion to dismiss the case, alleging submission of a fraudulent document because Deutsche Bank was not owner of the note. He filed another motion questioning the credibility of the Stern firm and the lawyer on the case, he said. On June 14, Deutsche Bank withdrew the case.

Earlier this year Mr. Stern, who has profited handsomely from the foreclosure trade, sold the part of his operation that provides support services for his firm's foreclosure work — DJS Processing — to a public company called the Chardan 2008 China Acquisition Corporation. The processing company and affiliates generated revenue of $260 million in 2009, financial filings show.

Brian Foley, a compensation consultant in White Plains, concluded that Mr. Stern made $17.8 million in 2008, including $12.64 million in compensation and nonrecurring benefits of $4.36 million. In the deal with Chardan, Mr. Stern and his affiliates were paid $93.5 million: $58.5 million in cash and $35 million after the transaction closed, according to government filings. In addition, Mr. Stern got a promissory note for $52.49 million to be paid out over the next couple of years.

In recent years, Mr. Stern and his wife, Jeanine, have bought nearly $60 million in real estate, mostly in Florida, property records show. Their Mediterranean-style home on Harborage Isle Drive, in a gated community in Fort Lauderdale, faces water on two sides and cost almost $14 million. Not far away, in Hillsboro Beach, the Sterns bought two waterfront properties for $17 million.

Mr. Stern also spent $6.8 million last year on a 9,273-square-foot apartment at the Castillo Grand Residences in Fort Lauderdale, part of a Ritz-Carlton complex. He and his wife own two homes in Beaver Creek, Colo.; one was purchased in 2001 for $4.975 million, and another bought in 2007 for $14.2 million.

His automobile collection may be worth $3 million, auto experts said; it includes a 2008 Bugatti, multiple Ferraris, Porsches and Mercedes and a Cadillac.

This being Florida, Mr. Stern also collects boats. A 108-foot Mangusta yacht, Lady J, is for sale at $5.9 million, Web postings show. It was replaced by a 130-foot yacht that cost about $20 million, according to an acquaintance who requested anonymity over concerns about Mr. Stern's influence in the community.

In a nod to his foreclosure work, according to the acquaintance, Mr. Stern mused about possibly naming the larger yacht Su Casa Es Mi Casa — “Your House Is My House.” But his wife and others cautioned against it, according to this acquaintance, and Mr. Stern named the boat “Misunderstood.” Mr. Stern denies that he considered the “Su Casa Es Mi Casa” name.

Resigned to Moving

While Rodney Waters and Terri Reese are resigned to leaving their home and moving their family into a rental, they still face another problem.

Under Florida law, a lender may pursue Mr. Waters for the difference between what it says he owes on the house and what it will fetch in a sale. Thanks to foreclosure fees and other charges, he owes almost double the $138,500 received in February by the seller of a neighboring house.

Included in the amount that Mr. Waters owes is almost $10,000 in fees generated by AmTrust's lawyers in the case. Mr. Bowden, the retired judge overseeing the case, ordered Mr. Waters to pay the fees.

His lawyer, Mr. Parker, had hoped to persuade the owner of the note to offer a new loan to his client in a smaller amount to reflect the reduced value in the property. He argued that this would be a better outcome for the lender and the borrower, since a foreclosure usually ends up costing a lender far more than does a principal write-down that leaves the borrower in the home.

But with the judge ruling in favor of the lender, such a deal is unlikely. Mr. Parker filed an appeal late last week, but Mr. Waters may have to file for bankruptcy to stop the foreclosure sale.

Thanks Jon. Fox tried the same thing here a couple weeks ago. Please remind the judges to defer to me (or you if they are more comfortable with you). I know she totally side-swiped the judge. I'll be getting with Rick this morning. I believe Fox will keep doing these types of stories just to generate publicity and sensationalize the foreclosure process. It is an unfortunate situation that Fox seems to have chosen a side in. Please keep me posted and I will do the same for you.

Thanks.

Shelia,

I wanted to bring this news story to your attention. I was off yesterday when this occurred. We were not contacted regarding this story. Our staff and Judge Richards relayed what happened this morning. Attached is the story Stopping Rocket Docket injustice. This was a very slanted report and in my opinion some very poor and unprofessional journalism. The reporter basically ambushed Judge Richards in our lobby while he was trying to get back up for his next hearing.

Re: Writs of Possession in Residential Mortgage Foreclosure Cases

Dear Mr. Batista:

Thank you for your letter dated April 13, 2010. I understand that you are requesting entry of an Administrative Order that would mandate that Writs of Possession in residential mortgage foreclosure proceedings include a certification affirming compliance with the newly enacted Federal Protecting Tenants at Foreclosure Act.

I have thoroughly considered your request and understand that it is for the benefit of residential tenants who are perhaps caught between the parties involved in a foreclosure proceeding. However, the federal act was explicitly created to address those concerns. Your request that I, as Chief Judge, mandate an additional requirement not already provided for by the federal act, i.e. certification of compliance, could, unfortunately, be misconstrued as an attempt at legislation, as opposed to administration. An "Administrative Order" is strictly defined as "[a] directive necessary to administer properly the court's affairs," and it may be subject to debate as to whether the scope of your request goes beyond administration. Fla. R. Jud. Admin. 2.120(c).

Accordingly, at this time, I am compelled to respectfully decline your request for an Administrative Order. Of course, I encourage you to continue to educate the public and your clients on the new federal law and to bring any violations to the attention of the trial court on a case-by-case basis.

Thank you and your organization for the services that you provide to the citizens of the Twentieth Judicial Circuit.

Sincerely,

G. Keith Cary
Chief Judge
